

Ferrovial awarded water treatment contracts in Texas worth 274 million euro

- Two contracts are part of the expansion of Houston's Northeast Water Purification Plant.
- The will also build a new surface water treatment plant in the city of Pearland, south of Houston.

Madrid, 04/07/2019.- PLW Waterworks, owned by Ferrovial Agroman subsidiaries Webber and Cadagua, has been selected to participate in the construction of two water treatment plants in Texas with a combined value of 312 million dollars, equivalent to 274 million euro.

Firstly, the company will execute two contracts as part of the project to expand Houston's Northeast Water Purification Plant. PLW Waterworks will install more than 37,000 linear meters of underground pipelines and build a new treated water pumping station, with a capacity of 1.21 million cubic meters per day. Those contracts, together worth 192 million dollars (169 million euro), are expected to be completed in 2024. The expansion of Houston's Northeast Water Purification Plant is the largest Design and Construction project under way in this industry in the United States. When completed, the plant will serve over 2 million people.

Secondly, PLW Waterworks is to build a surface water treatment plant in the city of Pearland, south of Houston, for 120 million dollars, equivalent to 105 million euro. The work includes executing pre-sedimentation and processing facilities, pumping stations and pipelines. The plant, which will serve a population of 75,000, is expected to be ready in 2023.

In 2016, Ferrovial, through Webber, acquired Pepper Lawson with the intention of expanding in the water business in the United States. Cadagua has also strengthened its presence in the country with several projects, such as upgrading a wastewater treatment plant in the municipality of Trophy Club and a drinking water treatment plant in Corpus Christi, both in Texas.
